

Deep Dive: Having Diversity on Your Team

Sue Nokes

I think it's important for any organization to build a culture and our ideal culture would be to be a place where all people are valued. And that of course has to do with race, creed, color, religion. But it also sometimes is making sure that you have representation from the markets and the communities that you're trying to serve.

Sometimes we will build a team. I've walked into product development teams that are 50 guys. And you say, well, where are the phones for the girls? Because they're silver and black. There's no pink and girls may want a pink phone.

So what are you doing to understand the markets that you serve and have somebody in the room that can tell you a little bit about where they come from and help you understand who you're trying to serve and the employees that you're trying to hire to serve those markets so that you develop a better product and service and the entire organization wins.

The company wins, the employees win because they're contributing to something they believe in and their customers are loving the product.