

Remembering Pat: Being a Leader at All Times

Alexis Hornbuckle

Coach Summit was a stickler for leadership, teaching it, challenging you as a leader and definitely holding you accountable for moments that you weren't. I remember a time when Coach Summit was on me about leadership. She was an advocate about leadership and how you lead and when you lead, which was all the time.

I didn't think it was all the time. So, I recall in South Carolina at South Carolina as a point guard, not performing well, particularly that day. And Pat was on me. About not calling the right plays, not communicating well, you know, the little things, attention to detail. And when she asked me, actually, she said, "You look like you've never touched a basketball day in your life."

I whipped my head around as a nice young, hardheaded rookie and said, "Well, you recruited me."

That got me all types of time on the bench guys. She basically let me know this is not what leadership looks like. I learned that lesson. Took me one time. From then on out, I knew how serious she was about communicating, attention to detail, being resilient in tough times, and leading, no matter what the circumstances.
