

Lesson 2: The Next Play

Corinne Milien

One time I remember going to the Virgin Islands. Playing in a regular tournament. And just like with any tournament, any trip, the expectation is that we're going on an excursion and just having a good time.

Well, on this particular trip, we just happened to lose one game. And the players were not having it. The players didn't want to have anything to do with an excursion. They wanted to be in their beds and sulk.

Pat was not letting that happen either. She made sure that those players understood that no matter the outcome, you bounce back. You take advantage of the opportunities that you have, in this case, being in the Virgin Islands and going on a trip. It's called rebounding. Whatever happens, you think of the next play. The next play in this case, again, was going on this trip.

So anytime I think about, oh man, I don't feel good about doing this, I have to think next play.
