

Lesson 6: Transparency

Corrine Milien

When I think of communication, a story that often comes to mind is the time when Pat was announcing her illness. And it was very early in the season. We hadn't even started the season yet. We had freshmen just on campus.

And it was very important that the players heard it from her. She didn't want the Knoxville News. She didn't want ESPN. She didn't want parents or anyone telling her players her story. So, I had to round up all these players, find them wherever they were, and bring them to the office so that Pat had the time, the transparency to communicate what was going on.

And I think the players really appreciated that. They appreciated that she cared enough about what they thought in that moment to make the time to let them know what she was going through and what they could expect over the next year.
