You don't have to be necessarily the captain of a team. You can impact people and lead by example and how you handle the role you're in and the responsibility that you have.

Ask anyone who has been leading for a while and they'll tell you leading required a lot more of them than they understood when they took the job.

A recent Harvard Business Review article revealed that 50 to 60 percent of executives fail within the first 18 months of being promoted or hired. That startling revelation leaves us wondering what can be done to increase the success rate for those of us who are leading, who aspire to lead, and for those of us who want to expand our skills. Sixty out of 100 executives miss the mark. And one thing we know that they all share in common is that they're in charge ... of something.

So, what do the other 40 possess that pushes them into the category of success? Is it raw talent? Functional competence? Do they have the right internal connections or is it just dumb luck? Leading isn't easy, and being responsible means you'll have to make tough decisions that may not be very popular with everyone on your team.

The truth is, being in charge or having a title, isn't enough. And, as we're going to learn in the module, Coach Pat Summitt's approach to leadership can teach us some powerful and relevant lessons about what it means not just to be in charge but to take full responsibility as a leader.

Leadership requires sacrifice, commitment, and action. Those descriptions sound like something out of a superhero movie. But, what about when leadership requires us to make hard, unpopular decisions?

Who can think about basking in the glory of sitting in the big chair when there is a seemingly constant stream of complaints and problems? It's no wonder that taking full responsibility crushes nearly 60 percent of newly promoted or hired leaders.

When you complete this module, you'll have some practical examples and actionable strategies for being the kind of leader that takes full responsibility.

As Coach Summitt believed, there are no shortcuts to success and you can't assume larger responsibility without taking responsibility for the small things, too.
