

Be a Competitor: Introduction, Featuring Roberto Fernandez

Roberto Fernandez, Medical Director, The Pat Summitt Clinic at The University of Tennessee Medical Center

“How badly do you want to succeed? Bad enough to push through any obstacle, to push beyond the perception of your limits?” Pat (Summitt) shared these thoughts on being a competitor. “What are competitive instincts good for? Why were we given them? I believe that they are meant to help us battle adversity, to help us endure difficult situations, to help us get up when we’ve been knocked down, and to help us prevail over the blows that life deals us. Really. When I teach basketball, I am trying to teach our players about life.”

Pat Summitt was a competitor in the truest sense of the word, from growing up playing Halo basketball with her three older brothers to fighting for and earning respect as a champion collegiate coach, all while stretching the public perception of what women can do in sports; Pat never backed down from a challenge. She rose to every occasion and redefined her limits by expanding her expectations for herself and for others. Pat Summitt understood the power that competition had to bring out one’s best.

In this module, you will hear from Phillip Fulmer. You will hear from this NCAA championship football coach that being a competitor is not just about ability, but about aspiration. It’s about the heart and the impenetrable grit that grounds you in the face of extreme challenges. You will learn how to use the power of a competitive spirit as leverage for success in your own battles.

Pat Summitt said that “competitiveness is what separates achievers from the average. Only by learning to compete can you discover just how much you are capable of achieving.” So once again, the question is, “How badly do you want to succeed?” Don’t settle for anything less than your best. Journey with us and discover how to unlock the full expanse of your own potential.
